

QR codes were not born in marketing.

They started as a very practical answer to a factory problem.

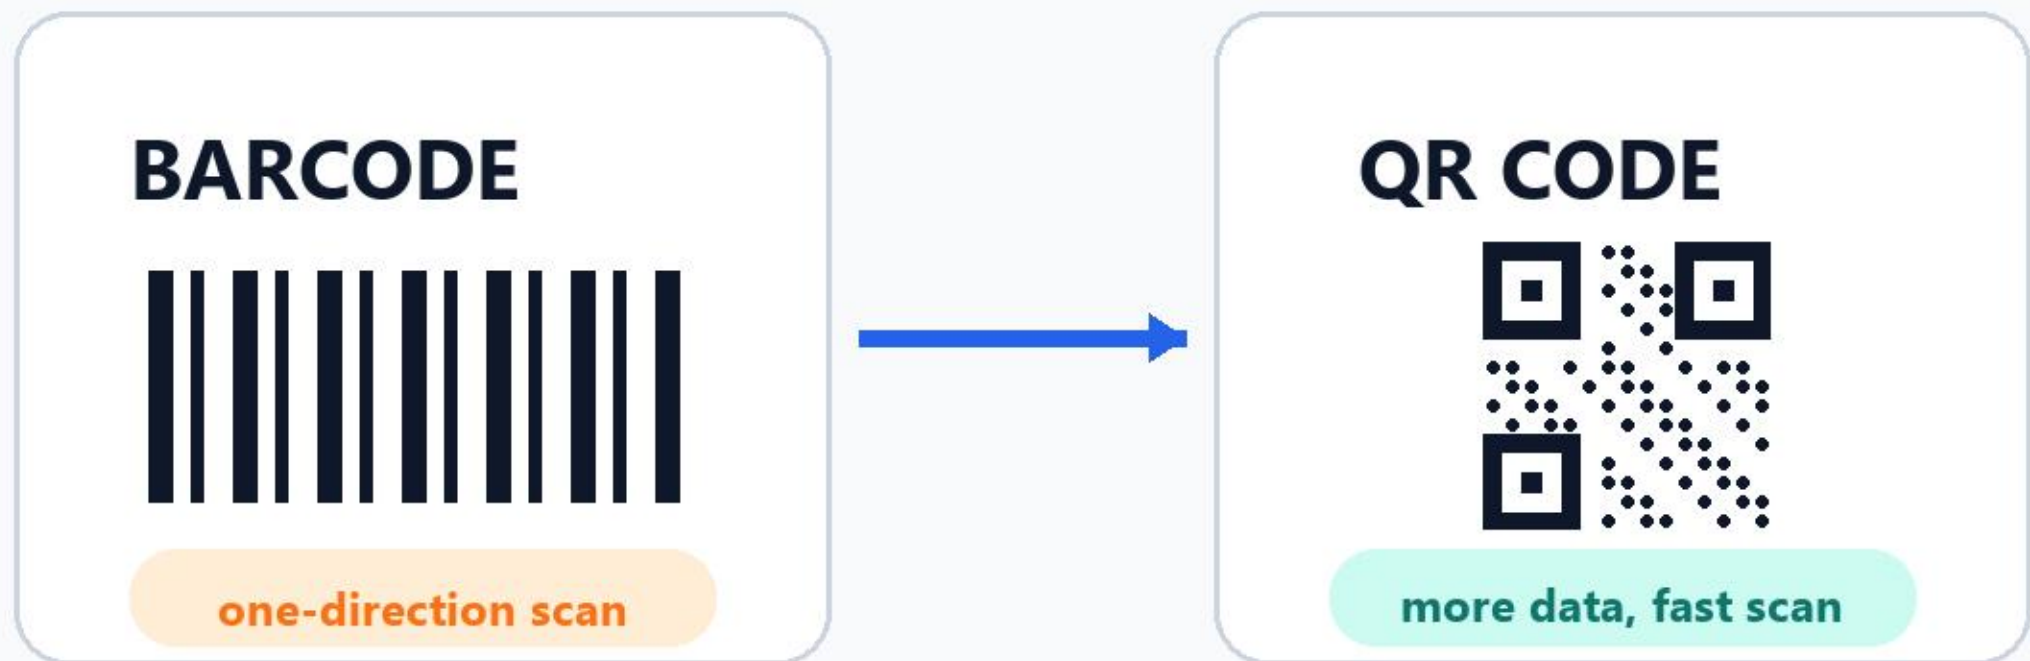

not a gimmick origin story

The first job was tracking car parts.

Denso Wave developed QR codes to make scanning faster and more useful than old barcode workflows.

Barcodes were useful. But they had a ceiling.

The design brief was not glamorous.

 fast scans

 more data

 error correction

 easy orientation

Marketing adopted QR codes for the same reason factories did.

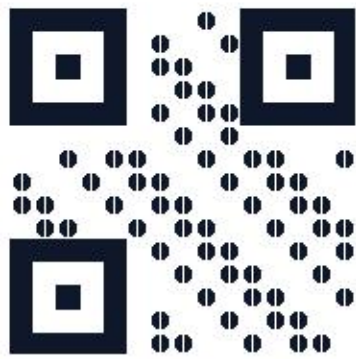

They move information from a physical surface to a digital action.

The best QR use cases are usually boring in the right way.

QR codes work best when they do one useful job.

Not magic.
Not a whole campaign.
Just a fast handoff from physical interest to a clear next step.

Look at one printed asset. Does it have a real next step?
